Communications 320: Perspectives on Sports Media and Communication
Corso
This course explores the complex and often overlooked dynamic of sports communication in today’s society and what we can learn about our cultural norms and values through sport. Since most of our exposure to sports is mediated through media (watching events on television, listening to sports talk radio, reading sports magazine, or surfing sports news websites), there will be special attention to how the media contributes to the ongoing discourse in this area. Drawing on theories of media and rhetorical criticism, this course will examine media’s role in telling the story of sports, and how telling that story shapes and reinforces cultural values. This is an online course.

Physics 141: Foundations of Physics I
Caylor
The first three weeks of an introductory study of physics (mechanics, heat, electricity, magnetism, waves, light, and modern physics) without calculus. Some emphasis will be given to applications of physics to biological systems. A laboratory is included. Prerequisite: a good background in high school mathematics including algebra and trigonometry.

Physics 142: Foundations of Physics II
Caylor
The second three weeks of an introductory study of physics (mechanics, heat, electricity, magnetism, waves, light, and modern physics) without calculus. Some emphasis will be given to applications of physics to biological systems. A laboratory is included. Prerequisites: PHY 141 or PHY 151

Physics 151: Principles of Physics I
Caylor
The first three weeks of an introductory study of physics (mechanics, heat, electricity, magnetism, waves, light, and modern physics). Some basic concepts of calculus may be introduced as needed. A laboratory is included. Co-requisite: MTH 150 or higher.

Physics 152: Principles of Physics II
Caylor
The second three weeks of an introductory study of physics (mechanics, heat, electricity, magnetism, waves, light, and modern physics). Calculus methods will be used. A laboratory is included. Prerequisites: PHY 151; Co-requisite: MTH 152 or higher.

Theatre 101: Introduction to Theatre
Jachimiak
An examination of the process by which dramatic literature becomes theatre. The course examines the forms of comedy, tragedy, and their offshoots as well as the elements of theatre – structure, character, language, scenography – and the styles of theatre with an emphasis on modernism and post-modernism. This course does not meet major requirements. This is an online course.
BLENDED LEARNING COURSE DESCRIPTIONS

Classes will have some required meetings on campus at the discretion of the instructor. Contact instructor for course syllabus details. Students must be in good academic standing to enroll in a blended learning course.

All classes receive 4 semester hours of credit. Prerequisites are indicated

Religion 119: Religion in America
Hickman, L.
A study of the many religions which constitute America’s religious mosaic. Attention is given to American religious history from 1600 to present and to the ways in which religious pluralism relates to America’s commitment to a religious freedom and to America’s ongoing quest for unity amid this diversity. This course includes an emphasis on pacifist religious movements and may be counted toward a minor in peace studies.

Political Science 104: International Politics
Aleprete
A study of politics among states and other actors who affect global relations. Once establishing a background in the concepts used to analyze world politics, students will use these concepts to explore the Cold War era, the end of that system and several pertinent international issues in the areas of security, economics, and the environment.
